Care of Fuel.

From the New York Evening World.

Most servants and, indeed, too many housewives, burn a great deal too much fuel in will give you help. there are many others who fill up the grate with coal and cooking. It is simbly waste to then punch and poke it till it nearly melts the top off the stove only to go through the process again when it is all burned out. When the fire is burning a small shovelful at a time will keep the oven in prime condition and cook every thing on top of the stove just as fast as though the vessels were dancing a jig from the immense heat. When a thing is cooking you can't make it cook any faster without spoiling it by burning or drying it up too fast. So it is with a heating stove. If you let the coal in the latrobe all get on fire at once it will drive you out of the room with heat, but it all burns to white ashes in an hour, when by feeding down properly it would have heated the house, and the one feederful would have sufficed for a whole day.
